

University of London Press launch a new Open Access in the Humanities online training course

University of London Press have developed a new online training course on open access publishing with the School of Advanced Study. The course is free and available via the School's RESHAPED platform – a new training and research community space for researchers in the Humanities.

The course offers an introduction to open access publishing for humanities researchers at all career stages, as well as students, librarians and research support staff, and provides the practical information needed to navigate today's open access landscape. It is divided into three interactive, accessible 20–30-minute modules covering what open access is; models, funding and licensing; and how to make your publications open access. It provides the practical information needed to navigate today's open access landscape. The course also includes interactive activities, knowledge checks, resource banks for further learning and videos with other experts in this space.

Explore the RESHAPED platform and the new open access course: Open Access in the Humanities. You can either create an account on the platform, or you access it as a guest with no login required.

Revision #2

Created 5 June 2025 13:19:54 by Anna Hughes

Updated 5 June 2025 13:24:49 by Anna Hughes